The Lady in Red

Chapter 1 by Alice Marie Bride

She was one of a peculiar generation, a generation of "special" offspring. She stood, looking out over a field of flowers, a tear sliding down her face. Though she gazed upon a pasture of a spectrum of colours- she could only see one colour shimmering in the light. They had told her this colour she saw was called "red." It was all she could see, so the idea of there ever being anything else was preposterous. Supposedly, others that were born in her generation also were confined to seeing only one "colour." There was one report of a girl being able to see the "colour" of death.

She did not think her, or any of the others', conditions were something odd, because it was all they had known. They were kept away from other children, even in schools.

"They're an unnatural phenomena, and should be dealt with accordingly," stated President Akura.

Eventually, the "monosighted" were allowed to attend normal schools. The normals reacted in harsh and violent ways, trashing monosighted's homes, possessions, and even going as far as creating public campaigns to "send the freaks home." There were wild accusations that they hailed from another planet entirely.

She came to be known as "The Lady in Red," as she was forced to always wear red clothing, signifying her "disability." There was one boy who was kind to her - a boy she didn't see as being 'red.'
